Hello, let me introduce you to Emily, can you see her? Emily is 7 years old and lives with her parents.

Carolina and Anna are Emily's best friends. They spend a lot of time together in school and after school.

One day Emily's father summoned the family to announce that he had been offered a new job and that they will move to a new city. This news left Emily very sad.

A few weeks later, Emily and her family took an airplane to their new home. Emily was very sad to leave her friends, even though her parents told her that she will soon find new friends. She felt very bad.
Once the family arrived in their new home, Emily could only think in how lonely she felt. She just hoped to get new friends quickly, friends with whom she could share new experiences.

Meanwhile, as Emily's mum was tidying up boxes, she noticed that Emily was quietly crying. She approached her and gave her a big hug. Emily told her mother that it was not fair that she never has been asked.

But all this, in the end, does not really matter a lot, because Emily's mum told her that when she was older her views would be taken into account. Maybe at the end, between too many adult activities, we are forgetting to listen to our children?

What would be a fair ending to this story in your opinion?
