Hello, I want to introduce you Joseph and Sandra. They live in the same country; but different parts. Joseph lives in the city, in a really good area, while Sandra lives in a small town with limited resources.

Joseph is a very normal child. He eats what he wants, goes to school every day, has lots of toys at home, a computer, etc.

Sandra is also a very normal girl. She eats only few times in a day, she is not going to school because in her town they do not have schools and at home she does not has toys, TV, etc.

Soon comes Joseph's birthday and he is more than exited about it. He wishes a Wii, exactly as his others friends. All that is, of course, quite normal for him.
In the meanwhile, Sandra has to work to earn food for her and her family. Many days a week she just can eat once a day; but that is okay because it is something that she is already used to, it is quite normal for her.

But what do you think would happen if Joseph lived in the small town of Sandra with all the things he has at home and Sandra lived in the city where Joseph lives with all things that she has? Surely Joseph would be the richest boy in the town and Sandra would be the poorest and saddest girl in the city.

But all this in the end does not really matter a lot, because Joseph lives in his city and Sandra lives in her town... Maybe at the end, with all this normality, it is necessary to make some changes so that things are not so different?

What would be in your opinion a fair ending to this story?