Long time ago, mankind lived in inequality. This meant that only a few could have privileges such as non-discrimination, not slavery, respect for life, etc.

One day a man named Cyrus the Great, King of Persia decided that such inequality was not at all fair and that all individuals should be considered equally.

So people started to think about how many things they had in common between each other.

Many years later, The King of England John I recognised the Magna Carta, in which he reduced his own privileges and recognised new ones to the nobility and other social classes.

After more wars and battles in which millions of people died, finally countries joined agreements in order to seek a change where the primary goal is: “to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person.”
